Singers Glen: An Informal Study of Historic Districting

by MARTHA CALDWELL, CAROLINE MARSHALL AND ROBERT SWANK

PART I: THE PROCESS

Remarks by Dr. Marshall

In 1972 Martha Caldwell, Robert Swank and I began on the long and bumpy road which led six years later to the listing of Singers Glen, Virginia as a historic site of the commonwealth and the nation. Each of us had his own separate interest in the project. I must say, in all humility, that we were an almost perfect team. This is not to imply that any one of us was brilliant, but among us we had all the necessary talents and training required for success. We were a combination which I recommend should you wish to do similar work.

Martha Caldwell is an art historian with a special interest in American Studies. She has enough training in architecture and architectural history to be able to identify and describe structures properly. She is also a good photographer. All buildings must be photographed, measured and described. It is immeasurably helpful if you have someone on the project who is competent to do these things.

J. Robert Swank is an amateur historian which simply means he is not formally trained in the field. He is a resident of Singers Glen and has for years combed local archives for information. His research is pure because he loves knowledge for its own sake. Also he has a huge collection of notes on every possible aspect of Glen life. Unlike many local historians, he long ago ceased being an antiquarian. He has drawn profound sociological and cultural conclusions from his research. For the Singers Glen project he was indispensable.

I am a professionally trained historian and probably the least implicitly valuable member of the group. Nevertheless, I have some skills which were useful. I compiled a bibliography of all known primary and secondary materials, wrote narrative descriptions of the historical evolution of the community and prepared a study of the German Anabaptist background of the settlers from which we drew certain conclusions about the original character of the community. I also did lots of contact work with the natives. I am a resident of the area and vaguely related to the Funks.

It may be that our project was primarily successful because we did not approach it in an especially organized way. For example, on no occasion did we form a committee of any kind nor did we set ourselves deadlines. An effort of this kind is sensitive. It involves people's most cherished memories and most delicate fears. It brings into play a great many emotions, some of them conflicting madly within single individuals. Such a project exposes the nerve ends of civilization. It requires that people define themselves in ways they had not thought of before. Research includes more than simple archival study. It asks people to recall their fathers and mothers, to relive haunted childhoods, to dredge up old loves and old hates. At the conclusion, the researcher is asking these same people to put themselves in a position in which their absolute rights over personal property are jeopardized. Such research demands tact and charity.

In the process of historic districting, it is necessary first to obtain the "forms." The forms tell you what is expected so that you have a good idea from the beginning exactly what is involved. We obtained our forms from the Virginia Historic Landmarks Commission. These materials are not extensive, but they do require very precise information. We began our work, and we would recommend that you do the same, with one structure. There are several reasons for this. The first has to do with the qualifications for any historic listing, whether it is one building or an entire community. In either case, you must be dealing with something which is historically interesting. If you do not have at least one historically interesting structure in a village full of buildings, the chances are very good that the village will not qualify anyway. Secondly, one structure will give you experience in the kind of work you will need to do for many other structures. If you grow exhausted or bored at this point, chances are very good that you will never be able to complete a much larger project. Thirdly, if you do complete work on a single structure, you will at least have succeeded in getting one listing. And lastly, you will have introduced a community to the project. One property owner will receive flattering letters on imposing stationery from Richmond and Washington. He will have his picture in the paper. He will look and feel important. Other people in the community will begin to want the same status. Psychologically, this is invaluable.

From the beginning, it is necessary to impress on the community the specific qualifications for the listing of individual structures. A beautiful old building does not qualify of itself. It must be historic, which usually means that someone important lived or worked in it. Or, it must be really unique in its architecture and design or be very old and very rare in some way. This is often difficult for people to understand, and it is important to prevent misunderstanding and hurt feelings wherever you can. We were very lucky in Singers Glen. We had an obvious place to begin, a man of historic importance and a beautiful and unique community. The man was Joseph Funk (1777-1862).

We then had the basic ingredient for success in a relatively famous local figure whose residence was still standing. The owner of the Joseph Funk House, Miss Ruth Swank, was anxious to be listed and she cooperated in every possible way. After we had completed our formal research on the house and on Joseph Funk, we submitted this work to a representative of the Virginia Historic Landmarks Commission. He came to Singers Glen, talked to Miss Swank, checked and accepted our work. In 1974, two years after we had begun, the Joseph Funk House was a state and national shrine. We then proceeded to research the entire community. Here we were fortunate because eighty-five percent of all structures were pre-1900. The standards of vernacular architecture were high and most buildings were quite well preserved. Among the most difficult of our tasks was individual research on each house in which we traced its ownership and confirmed its construction date. Each house or structure in an historic district must be submitted with the name and the address of the present owner. You should be forewarned that if you aspire to national listing, the Department of the Interior will contact the owner of every building submitted. They will explain the meaning of national registration, send a copy of the Federal Tax Reform of 1976 and give the owner an opportunity to agree or disagree with the procedure. At this point, it is critical that your public relations work has been of the highest order. People tend to be frightened by communication from the "Feds." They should be forewarned and reassured. They should have ready access to local people whom they trust. This is a deed best accomplished on an individual basis. We do not recommend general meetings in which individual egos may come into play or one person's hysteria may influence the entire group. Obviously, all of this takes a great deal of time.

Another time consuming activity is the preparation of the local government. After your research work has been accepted by the Virginia Historic Landmarks Commission, you must make an effort to get the endorsement of your local government. In our case, it was the Board of Supervisors of Rockingham County. Dr. Caldwell and I and a member of the Virginia Historic Landmarks Commission met with the Chairman of the Board and the County Administrator. In this session we were able to explain the meaning of historic districting and answer any doubts which lingered in the minds of these two critical men. Before our meeting we solicited letters of support from half of the community. We included not only residents of the village, but most importantly, owners of farms in the outlying area. This indicated to the Board that we had a highly traditional agricultural community which was not interested in the dubious pleasures of development. Since it is not reasonable to suppose that so many people will write these letters, however sympathetic they may be to the cause, you will probably have to write them yourself. Each letter should be short and should contain some personal reference to the signatory's ties with the community. Make sure that each signatory reads his letter and agrees with its content. He will then sign it, and you will buy the stamp and mail it. This was our most effective tool in dealing with local government. We might have used a petition, but it would not have been as effective. Politicians are deeply moved by large numbers of letters from their constituents.

The Chairman of the Board will then submit your request for districting to the members in a routine meeting. We think it is better not to request an open meeting because such a request may imply confrontation, even when none is intended. We received our endorsement within a week of submission in a regular meeting of the Board. Such endorsement is necessary. The Virginia Historic Landmarks Commission is even now in litigation over the status of Historic Green Springs, Virginia. The weakest point for the Commission's case was the lack of endorsement by the local government. It now wants to seal this breach for all time. If one is able to surmount the hurdle of local endorsement and Department of the Interior inquiries, the matter should be closed.

The question is, why all this trouble and bother in the first place. What do you get from historic districting that is of value? First of all, the people of the area obtain certain tax reliefs in regard to repair and rehabilitation and they are eligible for certain kinds of federal matching funds. Now that Virginia has passed a tax reform in the area of preservation, there will be possibilities for help from the Commonwealth. These tax measures need to be studied and explained to the residents. Although the Federal Government sends lengthy explanations of the 1976 Act, it reads very poorly. Like many communications from Washington, it is difficult for mere humans to comprehend. The League of Women Voters can provide a fine explanation of the recent Virginia law. Also, you may be sure that there will never be an international airport in your area, nor will great highways destroy the integrity of your community. You are not assured that change will not take place, but you have a vehicle of protest. It is reasonable to suppose that if you have obtained the kind of public support required for districting in the first place, that the residents of the community value the beauty and integrity of the place in which they live. They now have a proper vehicle for pressure against exploitation. It is very difficult for an individual to override this kind of unity for his own selfish purposes. He may legally do very many things. He may even tear down a structure. But the tax laws will punish him and his neighbors will probably harass him. It will simply no longer be practical to destroy or mutilate the community for one's own selfish purposes.

PART II: THE PLACE AND THE PEOPLE

A Slide Presentation by Dr. Caldwell

Singers Glen is both a village and a larger community surrounding the village. There is some controversy over the precise boundaries of the latter. For example, the local newspaper has an unfortunate habit of including the foothills of Little North Mountain wherein dwell all sorts of miscreants. Two things are clear: the perimeters of the community form a sort of mystical line between the people of grace within and the barbarians without and citizenship in the Glen, like citizenship in heaven, is more than a matter of simple geography.

Singers Glen — Joseph Funk home

The community was founded largely by three families: the Funks, the Swanks and the Ackers. They had the same general European (German Protestant) background, having migrated to British America from the Palatine in the early eighteenth century. By the end of the century they were settled in Western Rockingham County.

Although the Funks were clearly German Anabaptists peasants, the record is not complete for the other families. Both Swanks and Ackers are found on the early records of the Antioch Christian Church which may indicate an early Calvinist tradition. German Calvinists were almost as disadvantaged as German Anabaptists and would have felt some of the same pressure to immigrate.

Clearly, there were significant differences in life-style among these first generation settlers of Western Rockingham. One need only compare the elaborate brick mansion of John Swank (1832) and the little weatherboarded cabin of Joseph Funk to comprehend the difference. Neither the Swanks nor the Ackers shared the Funks preoccupation with religious ideas and musical creativity. It was the Funks who first built the Glen and made it famous. We shall begin with them.

The Funks migrated to Franconia, Pennsylvania in 1719 after two centuries of persecution. From the religious wars which dominated German life from 1520 to 1650 they had emerged Anabaptists (Mennonite). They acquired and lost property in the course of many land settlements. In the end they were driven to leave the Palatine for both religious and economic reasons. They prospered in the new world. Henry Funk was the first Mennonite Bishop in America. His family acquired land and wealth. However, the American Revolution disrupted everything. Like many of their neighbors, the Funks were trapped by politics and war. They were pacifists caught between two armies. Dissension broke out in the family. In 1786 Henry Funk the Second left his home for Virginia. He settled northwest of the village which his son Joseph (1777-1862) would found.

In 1810 Joseph Funk built a little weatherboarded cabin on what is today the western perimeter of the village. No one knows how he was educated or why he proceeded to do such remarkable things. He was literate in both German and English and was interested in religion and music. He began publishing religious music in the shaped note tradition. Joseph Funk did not invent this system although his grandson, Aldine Kieffer, made some original changes in it at the end of the century.

In 1847 Funk set up a printing press in a little loom house over the spring which was the reason for his selection of the property. There for almost thirty years the Funks printed music and religious tracts. With his sons Joseph Funk set up singing schools in which the shaped note system was used. Lean-to sheds were set up against the little house to house the students. The sons of Joseph Funk traveled far and near teaching music and, incidentally, creating a market for their father's song books. The most famous of the latter was Genuine Church Music, more popularly known as Harmonia Sacra. There was also a wide market for a musical periodical, initiated by Joseph and his sons, entitled The Southern Musical Advocate and Singers' Friend (1859-61; 1867-69).

A close look at the Joseph Funk House makes all this seem impossible. It is small with tiny rooms, an enclosed stairway and lovely exposed beams. But it is so small. Imagine Joseph Funk carrying on a great creative enterprise here with thirteen children and assorted students! The loom house in which the printing and bindery work was done was even smaller and simpler. It was built of log and collapsed sometime prior to 1934.

Next door to the Joseph Funk House are the two huge, tall houses which his grandsons, William and Joseph Funk, built in the 1890's. They illustrate how far the family had come in three generations of village Funks. In their Victorian grandeur they stand in alarming contrast to the home of the Founding Father. However, to continue the story in chronological order, we must skip these then and look at a much simpler dwelling adjacent to them on the East.

The Funk-Acker House was built about 1850 by Timothy Funk a son of Joseph and father of Willie and Joe. The land and structures in this part of town are graphic illustrations of change and expansion in the Funk family in the nineteenth century. Timothy was a seminal figure in the transition from the original Funk ethic, religious, creative, highly individualistic to a more mainstream American point of view.

Singers Glen — Homes of Joseph Funk's grandsons

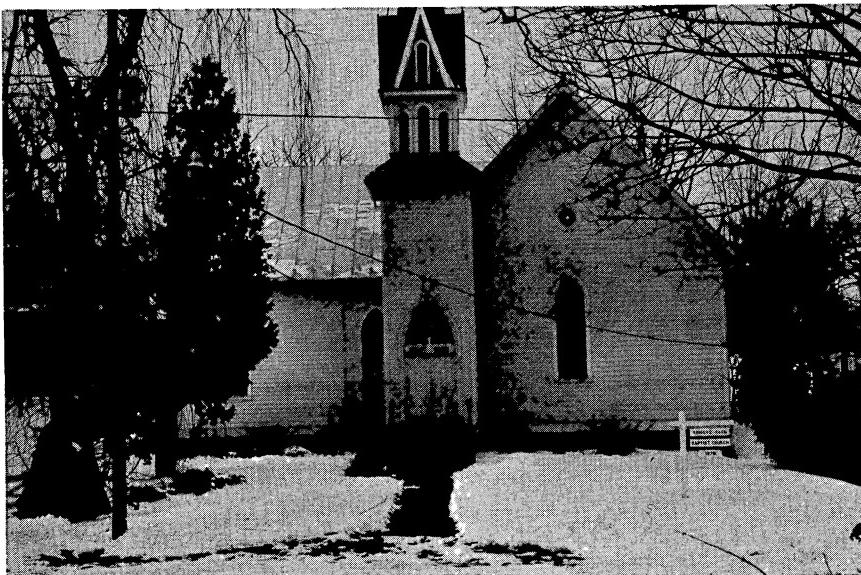

In 1876 the first Baptist congregation was organized. Twelve years later it built a church next door to Timothy on land given by him. It is a monument to his family's friendly new face to the world. Its doctrines were sufficiently modern to permit participation in public institutions and secular society while at the same time preserving the spirit of the original Anabaptist tradition. The younger Funks were apparently converted by a Baptist missionary at Turleytown during the Civil War.

1876 is also the year in which the Funk Press left Singers Glen for Dayton, taking with it the material and moral heart of the old regime. Two years following, in 1878, T. Funk and Sons Mercantile was founded. Directly across the road from the Funk-Acker House and the Baptist Church stands the mercantile's last home, T. Funk and Sons (1895), an huge, imposing, false-fronted brick stone. Today it seems quite incredible that Singers Glen could have once boasted such enterprise.

Let's look at these buildings carefully. The Funk-Acker House recalls the typical solid frame valley farmhouse of the period. It is bigger than the Joseph Funk House. In spite of the later addition of a parlor during the residence of Timothy's son-in-law, State Senator John Acker, it has a certain gracious symmetry. In no way, however, does it equal in size or grandeur the twin houses of Willie and Joe. The conclusion is simple. Timothy got rich and rather worldly. His sons got richer and worldlier still.

The church, like everything else, is homemade. It is simple and frame like Timothy's house. However, it has certain distinguishing features. The variety of designs on the steeple are interesting. The beautiful wood carving over the doors and windows is unusual. One wonders why local carpenters, John and Edwin Funk, would have used a French Medieval symbol like the fleur-de-lis. Perhaps they saw it in a copy book and thought it resembled a cross, which it does. The tiny round window is lost in the great expanse of the front surface. Were they attempting a primitive form of rose window which they could not quite bring off? The whole effect is very charming, reflecting an imagination caught between rural simplicity and a yearning for something more subtle, more sophisticated.

If the church represented the domain of the spirit in Singers Glen, T. Funk and Sons represented the domain of wealth and worldly power. It is an enormous building even without the 1905 addition. Constructed of two stories of brick with a pressed tin false front it was apparently built by Fred Baer, son of Hannah Funk Baer, and Timothy's nephew. It is similar in workmanship to an imposing brick bank building in Timberville. Fred Baer's papers prove that he was responsible for every aspect of the construction of the bank. There is as yet no documentary evidence of his relationship to the store, but the physical evidence is very great.

T. Funk and Sons was used for all sorts of diverse activities. It was a clearing house for Funk businesses: orchards, apple packing and shipping, timber, cattle and wool, as well as serving as a general store. It was also used for public gatherings, school functions, patent medicine shows, silent movies and town meetings. When Willie Funk's son-in-law, Dr. C. S. Dodd, was suffering a low point in his career, he talked the parents of Singers Glen into having their children's tonsils removed. The store became the scene of a tonsillectomy en masse, and there is today an entire generation of sixtish villagers who are sans tonsils.

The store was used, too, as a meeting place for the local Republican Committee. It is in this setting that the meaning of the triangle of house, church and store becomes complete, because the other half of the Funk-Acker House was Senator John Acker (1845 - 1923), County Superintendent, member of the House of Delegates, State Senator, undisputed leader of the local Republicans (for a time) and Timothy Funk's son-in-law. In addition to material power, there was political advantage.

John Acker was a curious man. He came from the Linville-Edom area, served in the Confederate Army with considerable distinction, married Jennie (Mary Jane) Funk and became a Republican. He also became a Singers Glen Baptist in a private immersion. At one time the Republican Committee was comprised of John Acker, his father-in-law, his brother-in-law, his son-in-law and a few others. There were rumors of vote-buying, helped along by an old gentleman who, after casting his ballot in the store, announced that he had voted for T. Funk and Sons and a new pair of shoes! Senator Acker approved of success. When one of his daughters married a preacher with no prospects, he cast her out, declaring she could return in her coffin. He relented only when the preacher became surprisingly well-to-do. In his final years Senator Acker suffered a devastating loss of wealth and power. His decline probably began with a coup in the Republican Committee in which the family machine lost control. Crippling arthritis demoralized him, and expensive "cures" sapped his wealth. At least he moved into the Glen with his wife and unmarried daughter, Miss Eva Acker. Miss Eva served her parents with a loyalty both admirable and sad. Her love for this proud, hard man is the kindest witness he left behind.

Two additional pre-1900 structures reveal much about the early history of the Glen. The Funk-Gray House was built by Edwin Funk in 1892. He was a grandson of Joseph Funk and a great carpenter. In a time before pre-fab Edwin not only built, but designed his own home. He was an artist, and the intricate porch carvings and window decorations are almost musical in their gentle harmony.

Such creativity is striking and important because by the end of the nineteenth century, the original Funk commitment to art was rapidly fading. Next door to the Funk-Gray House is another carry-over from the old creative tradition. Miss Beulah Baer lives in the home of her paternal grandmother, Hannah Funk Baer. Miss Beulah is the daughter of Fred Baer, an important builder and designer of the 1880's and 1890's. Mr. Baer specialized in stone masonry. The lovely bluestone wall which surrounds the Baptist parsonage (1889) is one of his finest achievements. Miss Beulah Baer has spent most of her life working for the Passport Office of the Department of State in New York. However, she has managed a second career in painting and has recently published her autobiography. The stream of individualism and creativity has not quite disappeared.

When we come to the little house just beyond the Baptist Church, we reach an important line of demarcation in the village. This is the Franklin-Ridgely House (1891). Mr. Benjamin Franklin was the first mayor of Singers Glen, elected following its incorporation in 1894. Incorporation was probably the result of pressure from T. Funk and Sons and the Schaffer Carriage Works, both of which were anxious to facilitate their businesses through the addition of duckbill sidewalks. They were not anxious, however, to pay for same; thus the act of incorporation and a tax. Benjamin Franklin was not intimately involved with either of the major village clans. In addition, he was a man of impeccable honesty. His house is a curious scaled-down version of the Willie and Joe Funk twins. In it he kept a large family plus a basement jail for Saturday night offenders. His wife cooked for the prisoners.

Beyond the Benjamin Franklin House is the East End of the Glen, the domain of the Swanks, their relations and appendages. This break on Main Street is clean and sharp. As we noted previously, the Swanks settled in Western Rockingham County at about the same time as the Funks. We have discussed the first generation differences between the Swanks and the Funks. In the second generation, the assets of John Swank were split among several heirs. Of these, J. Perry Swank, a farmer and stockman, was probably the most successful. In the third generation, the Swanks became important in the history of Singers Glen when S. Henton Swank opened a store in the village in 1890. Later on, Henton Swank and his son-in-law, Don Ruddle, acquired the orchards formerly owned by T. Funk and Sons. It is important to note that the sons of Timothy Funk lost most of their extensive properties at about the time Ruddle and Swank acquired the orchards and the apple packing business.

The east end of the village is therefore in some part a record of the Swank ascendancy in the early twentieth century. We are going to look at three buildings which reflect the social and economic development. The first is the Swank-Ruddle House, the history of which is a graphic demonstration of change. It was formerly the Jacob Freeze House, a brick residence built west of the Singers Glen cemetery in 1826. In 1885, T. Funk dismantled it and moved it into the village where he apparently intended to use it as some sort of business establishment. Instead, he sold it to George Shaffer, a Swank in-law, who made it into a carriage factory. In 1903, S. Henton Swank purchased it and turned it into a residence. Eventually it passed to Mr. Swank's daughter, Mabel Swank Ruddle, and her husband, Mr. Don Ruddle, who was also her father's business partner.

The next building we want to consider is the Singers Glen Post Office, formerly the Swank store. It was built by S. Henton Swank in 1890. With the exception of a few months in 1961, it has been the Singers Glen Post Office since 1914, when it replaced T. Funk and Sons as home for the United States Mails. The first Postmaster was Mrs. Maude Swank Lee (d. 1974). Today her daughter, Mrs. Nancy Lee MacAllister is the Postmaster. It is an almost perfect example of the rural Virginia commercial building. Although it is no longer a store, it is still an important part of community life. A final structure which illustrates the development of the Swank family is the Donovan Memorial United Methodist Church. It was built in 1905 to replace the former Union Chapel from which the Baptist Funks had seceded in 1888. The Swanks were Church of the Brethren. The 1905 church was named in honor of an early pastor, John D. Donovan, a Swank in-law.

This is a remarkably attractive building. At first glance it may appear to be simply another provincial rendition of Perpendicular Gothic. On closer inspection, the viewer will note the interesting three-dimensional brickwork on the towers which makes this church unique in the Valley. A process of unification has brought the church to its present United Methodist status.

Conclusion

It is obvious that in Singers Glen, we have a nineteenth century jewel. In it, we are provided not only with a textbook overview of nineteenth century architecture, but with intriguing social history as well. Singers Glen will probably always be most important because Joseph Funk established his press there. However, it is our hope that in the future we may explore all of the many facets of this village, both architectural and social. We hope you have some feeling for the life there and that you will visit us soon. Seeing is believing!

GYPSY HILL PARK

By Harry E. Baylor, Jr.

Reprint from Richmond Times-Dispatch, July 9, 1939

"For a city of its size, Staunton has one of the most beautiful and well-kept parks I have ever seen." This is the constant refrain of visitors — and they are right; Gypsy Hill Park is a place of beauty.

In every direction spread close-clipped lawns thickly dotted with trees, shrubs and neat flower beds, intersected by trim gravel walks. Through it all meander stone-lined creeks, spanned here and there by a picturesque stone bridge or impeded by a rock dam.

Ducks and stately swans glide over a small lake, in the center of which an ancient weeping willow tree rises from a tiny island. The swan lake is the keynote of the quiet beauty which pervades the park.

In autumn, the brilliant and varied colors of the trees make a gorgeous picture, and soon after the leaves fall, everything is made as trim and clean as a battleship. A winter blanket of snow gives another aspect of beauty, and the glorious awakening of spring completes the cycle.

But Gypsy Hill Park has practical as well as esthetic value. It is truly a playground for those of all ages from Staunton and its vicinity.

On hot summer days, hundreds throng the 150-foot swimming pool and 30-foot wading pool, built and operated by the Staunton Fire Department.

The golfer finds a good nine-hole course with nominal green fees, and there are tennis courts and an outdoor badminton court.

The baseball field, admittedly the best in this section of the State, was equipped last year for night playing by an organization of ardent fans. Here the city recently erected a fine grandstand seating approximately 500.

The hockey field has been utilized by the physical education department of Stuart Hall, Staunton's famous Episcopal preparatory school for girls. Next fall, however, the school will have its own field, and this site has been converted into a softball diamond. The very active, but long homeless, Staunton Softball League, sponsored by the Y. M. C. A., is raising funds so that this field, too, may be lighted.

The children's playground, with standard equipment, is the hub of activities for the city's organized summer playground program.

Automobile riding in Gypsy Hill Park is perennially popular. A mile and a half of hard-surfaced driveway winds among the trees, and another half mile of gravelled road leads to the highest point in the park from which there is a pleasing view of part of the city. Even on the hottest days it is cool riding through the arboreal tunnels, and generations of Staunton motorists have had their first driving lessons in Gypsy Hill. This driveway is also popular with hikers and bicyclists, and its edge is much used as a bridle path. Both bicycles and horses may be rented near by.

Every Monday night throughout the summer, Staunton's historic Stonewall Brigade Band gives a concert at the park. Scores sit about on benches and watch their children play around the bandstand as they themselves did not so long ago. Other hundreds listen from automobiles parked on the edges of the encircling driveway and applaud with their horns.

Also during the summer, one of the Staunton churches holds its Sunday evening services in the park, and these early outdoor vespers attract many who otherwise would not attend a religious service at all.

Gypsy Hill Park seems to be the mecca of picnickers, and two outdoor ovens and stone tables with benches are placed about the park for their convenience. All summer long, they come — from small family groups to outings of large organizations. At the height of the season, there are often 2,000 to 3,000 people in the park in one day, and the family reunion notices in the local papers bear witness to the popularity of Gypsy Hill with these groups.

Various local organizations also sponsor lawn parties in the park which attract large crowds. One of the spaces for these affairs is permanently wired for lighting.

For a week each late summer, the fairground—a part of the park since 1893—is the scene of the Staunton Fair, which is attended by thousands from the surrounding territory.

For short and infrequent intervals during the winter, the lake within the fairground racetrack furnishes ice skating.

The old pavilion, built in 1890, now serves as a home for the local American Legion post.

Each summer all the Negro churches of Staunton and the surrounding territory as far as Lexington and Harrisonburg unite for a Sunday school picnic, and the entire facilities of Gypsy Hill Park—with the single exception of the swimming pool—are turned over to them for that day.

The land which now comprises Gypsy Hill Park was not originally acquired by the city for recreational purposes, but for its many springs which were needed to supplement the city's water supply. Evidence of this phase of the park's history is yet visible; the former pump house still stands beside the main entrance gate, and the park is dotted with small brick spring houses.

In 1876, the city purchased 30.38 acres from the executor of William W. Donaghe. The next year a small tract of the land of Robert Knightley was acquired by condemnation proceedings and added to this water works property. In 1881, the city purchased the water rights to the adjoining grounds of the Baldwin Augusta Fair Company, and two years later, 50 acres belonging to Miss Mary Donaghe were added.

The first step toward a park was taken in 1887. The water committee recommended to Council that "about 200 feet square" in front of the pump house be converted into a small park. It was two years later, however, before anything like the present park was envisioned. On May 7, 1889, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted by City Council upon motion of Councilman W. P. Tams:

"Whereas the city now owns 85 acres of land in rear of the pumping-house of the city Water Works, on which the head springs that supply the city with water are located, and whereas in order to protect said springs it is necessary for the city to forever retain control of said land and whereas the people of our city have no pleasure resort and those who live in small houses without yards are without the use of a cool and shady place to spend a few hours on close and sultry evenings —

"Therefore, Be it resolved, 1st, That the 85 acres of ground in rear of the pump house, except so much thereof as immediately surrounds said house, be placed under the control and supervision of the Committee on Public Grounds and Buildings.

"2nd, That said grounds shall here-after be known as 'Gypsy Hill Park.'

"3d, That said Committee be instructed to employ at once a competent landscape gardner or engineer to plat off said Park into walks and carriage drives and to designate thereon where shade trees and shrubs shall be planted, fountains placed and summer houses erected and the probable cost of such work as should be done at once to eventually carry out the purpose herein set forth."

The same year another small strip of Knightley land was condemned. In 1892, the fairground was purchased by the city, and the next year—on motion of Mr. Tams—it was made “a part and parcel of Gypsy Hill Park.”

Throughout this period, Mr. Tams’ motions in regard to the park were ever-recurrent, and in 1937 recognition was given to the important part he played in its early days. Just inside the main entrance was erected a stone base supporting a bronze tablet inscribed as follows:

“IN MEMORY OF
WM. PURVIANCE TAMS
TO WHOSE VISION AND ENERGY THE INITIAL DEVELOPMENT OF
THIS PARK WAS DUE
1889.”

Although they may never have heard of him, successive thousands of Stauntonians have, for 50 years, honored the memory of William Purviance Tams by their enjoyment of the beauties and recreational facilities of his Gypsy Hill Park.

Company E, 5th Regiment, Stonewall Brigade

Transcribed and with an introduction by Charles R. Chittum

Part I

In 1975 a number of original materials dating from the Civil War were discovered in the half-demolished building on Lewis Street in Staunton which served first as the Brethren Church and later as the VFW Hall. This event was covered in detail in the article, “Recovered Civil War Records” by Charles R. Chittum, in the Augusta Historical Bulletin, Vol. 12, No. 2, Fall 1976.

A ledger book found among these records contains original handwritten information about Company E, 5th Regiment of the Stonewall Brigade. There are entries listing deaths, transfers, wounded, and deserters. But the original Company Roll, published below is by far the most valuable documentation.

(A second article in a later Bulletin will contain the rest of the ledger’s contents).

The records of Confederate army units in the Virginia State Library have been consulted to verify certain names, but the Staunton manuscript appears to be more accurate. In addition, it contains detailed descriptive information about individual soldiers, which is completely lacking in the state records. The material presented here is transcribed exactly as it appears in the original version.

OLD HOMES OF AUGUSTA COUNTY

"LIMESTONE ACRES"

The Home of Mr. and Mrs. Riley Wagner
Route 753. East off Route 613 (Springhill Rd. Ext.)

By Gladys B. Clem

It is uncertain as to when John Francis first came to what is now western Augusta County. It was not until around 1780 that he started to build his permanent home among these gently rolling hills.

As most early settlers, he used what was at hand for its construction. Limestone outcroppings were on every side and the many tall oaks and pines in the woods nearby assured him of ample building material.

History does not substantiate the fact, but judging from many structural details—the dwelling's rectangular lines, the room layout, chimneys on the inside walls and fireplaces cater-cornered—all hint that John Francis employed Hessian labor to either build or assist in the erection of his home. Many of the more substantial Valley settlers were glad to avail themselves of these artisans with their expertise in working with iron, wood and stone. These German mercenaries, employed by King George to subdue the American colonists, had been taken prisoner and later a number were brought to Charlottesville and Winchester. Many of these homesick Germans were only too glad of employment if for no other reason than the good square meals they were given in part payment.

The stone used in the dwelling was "dressed" smaller in dimension than the usual stone structure. The corner blocks, so carefully lined, still show the chisel marks of these early craftsmen of two centuries ago.

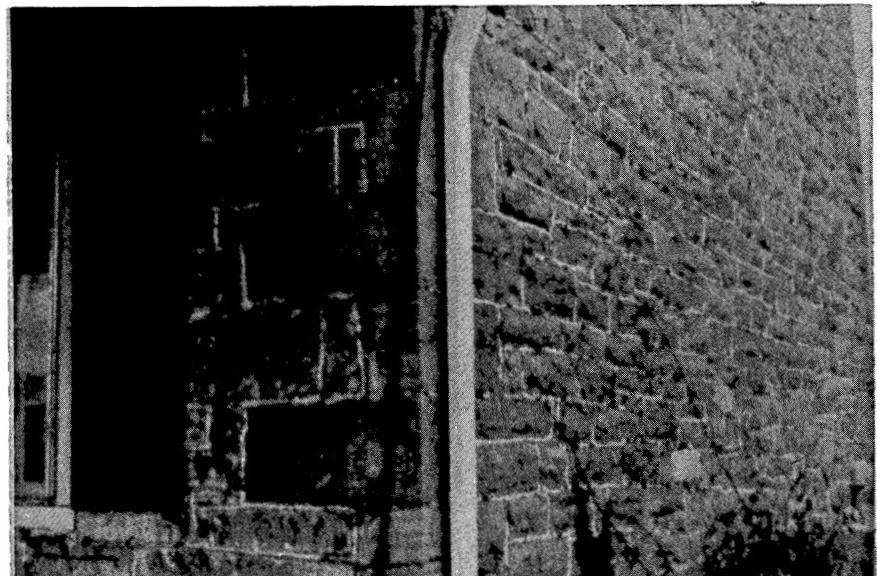

Presently a dwelling of nine rooms, a wing was added to the original many years ago, and one room has been made into two baths.

The 18-20 inch thick walls provide perfect insulation for the most extreme weather, be it hot or cold. The deep embrasures 18 paned windows are most original, their iridescent waviness attesting to their age. Much of the random width pine flooring is also original. The doors are crusader in style, with harmonizing chair rail and ceiling molding. A graceful stair way, with broad landing, leads to the second floor and overall attic.

Pine panelling in the family room now covers the original plaster in which hog bristles, left over from butchering day, were used as the plaster's "binding."

John Francis did not live long to enjoy his new home. He died in 1786, a stone bearing the exact date is visible above the ceiling of the front porch. In 1829 his heirs, John Hogshead, Sr. and his family, sold the property to Martin Coyner. Later the farm came into the possession of David Bell and his sons, John and James. It remained in the ownership of James Bell's heirs until 1884 when it was purchased by Samuel Driver. B. M. Huffman was the succeeding owner who disposed of it to William H. Hotinger. Following his death in 1924 his widow sold to W. F. Simmons, grandfather of the present owner, Mr. Wagner.

In 1974 Mr. and Mrs. Wagner embarked on extensive architectural changes on their home, which is also a modern dairy farm.

The original front entrance, which faced the east, was changed to a west frontage and tall columns added. In the process of these structural changes many souvenir relics of the Civil War came to light including parts of guns, buttons, coins, etc., indicating that skirmishes of more or less importance took place in the neighborhood.

After all it is only a few miles from the scene of one of the War's most brutal episodes.

*It was the last year of the War. Food was less than scarce everywhere in the Shenandoah Valley that had been the battle-ground of the two armies for the past several years.

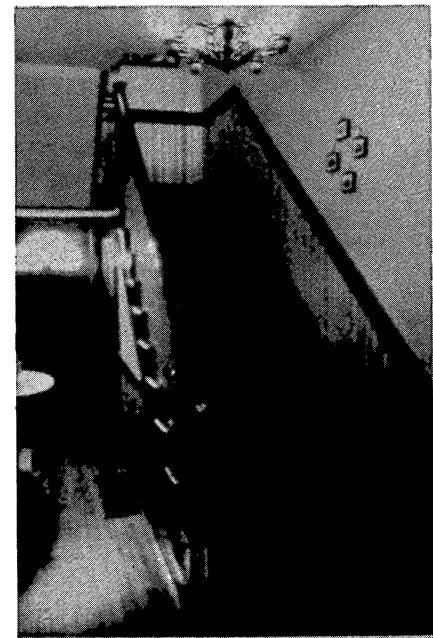

Arched entrance to cellar.

Davy Getz, a mentally retarded man of about thirty, whose home was in Woodstock, had gone into the nearby woods where he hoped to kill a squirrel or two. His fowling piece was only the broken parts of an old army pistol but in his child-like mind it was sufficient.

A troop of Federals, under General Custer, were on a foray up the Valley towards Staunton and making a short cut through the woods near Woodstock, came upon Getz. "Bushwhackers" had been active in the area and when the soldiers saw him assumed him to be one and took him to General Custer.

Known throughout the Valley campaign for his harsh and despotic military rule, Custer lost no time in letting the terror stricken Getz know his fate. He would be shot.

The town's most influential citizens, some of whom were Union sympathizers, went to Custer to intercede in Getz's behalf. But the General turned a deaf ear to their entreaties, in spite of the man's evident idiocy.

He ordered the unfortunate Getz tied behind a spring wagon and made to walk the forty miles to a hill near Bridgewater that would be the place of his execution.

From early morning the miserable man had trudged over the small stones of the Valley Pike, the hot September sun beating down relentlessly on his unprotected head.

As the detail reached the appointed place the sun was setting. In its last rays Getz was made to dig his own grave. He was then shot.

It is said the military detail ordered to carry out this barbarous order were so ashamed of their participation they would never divulge the spot of Getz's burial place. To this day it is said to be unknown.

One Woodstock citizen who had implored the Union officer to rescind his order and was repulsed, told him, "Some day, General Custer, you will sleep in a bloody grave for this dastardly deed." And when the news of the Indian massacre on the Little Big Horn River, where every soldier, including General Custer, lost their life, many recalled the prophecy made a dozen years before.

But all this happened over a century ago. No longer does the spectre of war touch the Valley. Even most of its scars have been smoothed away by the passage of time.

But an unusual bit of the past remains at Limestone Acres in the numerous pencilled autographs on the stone walls. Protected from the elements by the original wood shutters, names, initials and dates of those having lived or been guests here over a century ago, are still plainly visible. But the prize signature of them all is the one found on the cellar wall, "I wore my first pair of shoes when we dug potatoes. 1924." Was it the pinch of pain or pride in his new foot gear that prompted some youngster to leave this message from the past?
